MY FAITHFUL COMPANION IS TORN FROM MY SIDE AND RUTHLESSLY SLAIN. 1 MORALISE THEREON, AND PROCEED UPWARDS. THE WATERFALL. THE SPAWNING BEDS. MORTALITY AMONG THE KELTS. 1 COMMENCE MY RETURN TO THE SEA. The seasons wore on; summer had melted into autumn, and the breath of winter had blown icily on the woody banks of the beautiful river. Strange colours were reflected from the banks in lieu of the dark green that had so long prevailed, and the dead leaves, whirled around by the eddies of the fitful wind, were deposited by millions on the bosom of the water, floating down stream, as though they, like the swallows, were bent on migrating to some happier land. It was high time to seek the spawning-beds in the upper waters, towards which our course had been all along directed, and, though with somewhat impaired vigour, with an equally strong will, we recommenced our ascent. I think there is no creature on whom the lessons of experience are more completely thrown away than upon one of our race. Continually, for weeks past, we had observed with anxious eye the wiles practised for our destruction. But the moment we left the scene of our temptation, and the associations connected therewith, it seemed that all previous knowledge and caution, acquired by experience, had left us also. We had proceeded scarcely a mile on our upward journey, and were tarrying in the Boldside Water, when my companion,...
