Sold by her family to become a submissive courtesan to a powerful man, Branwyn arrives in a strange new land ruled by the castle of Black Dorn. Horrified by Branwyn's lack of knowledge regarding relations between a man and his woman, her instructor, Duna Trea, begins her daily lesson in the art of bedding a man. Branwyn stepped into a vast room with a wood floor. She looked about. Many tapestries hung on the walls. One displayed heroic soldiers crushing an enemy and another portrayed a mother suckling a child by a stream. Others confused Branwyn. On the floor, mounds of pillows were scattered about and a few chairs. Duna Trea appeared, as if from nowhere. Good morning Dune Branwyn. I trust you slept well and have recovered from your journey. She dropped into a deep curtsy. Oh yes, Duna Trea. I am quite rested. Leah serves you well. Yes, though we struggle with confusions over language and customs. Sit down, Dune Branwyn. Duna Trea pointed to a smaller chair as she settled onto a velvet-cushioned one. She ran her hand down the sides of her dress smoothing out the wrinkles. In her youth, the blackness of her dress would have matched the color of her, now speckled with grey, hair. We must converse. It is time to explain to you why you are here. I know I have been given to a man. I understand my duty to my uncle and aunt. They raised me and I have been a burden to them. It is time I Duna Trea raised her hand. That is not why. It is because of your wondrous beauty. Are not your cousins...
